Questioning Authority – by Brady Horner

Early in my youth ministry I discovered a generational gap in understanding. An adult youth ministry volunteer joined us on a trip and expected these wholesome Christian kids to be obedient little angels. This adult was immediately thrown for a loop and crisis ensued. I told her some of these kids won’t just do what you say because you said it, you must earn their respect, you don’t just get it because you are an adult authority. She was shocked and offended! I get that, there should still be a respect for elders and authority, but you should also be respectful to those you have authority over. I should say, this was not at Westgate, all our students are obedient little angels.

This may be an unfair overgeneralization because everyone is different, but it is becoming clearer that younger generations do not just obey leadership because it is the authority. Generation X started it, but now it has been taken to a whole new level. There is a major authority issue in our school system, just ask our teachers. Some generations (perhaps the older ones) assume authority was earned for a reason and thus trust it. Perhaps the authority had the right training, worked hard, or was elected or assigned to that position. The internet has allowed many to circumnavigate these traditional means of gaining authority. Rather than going through college or working their way up the ladder, people can become “influencers” through social media and YouTube. This general distrust of authority coupled with new ways of circumnavigating it may contribute to the dismantling of our most basic institutions.

I keep saying it, but I just don’t know what the answer is. I am glad we don’t just “follow orders”, we shouldn’t blindly trust worldly authorities. However, hyper individualism has made us weary of any authority that doesn’t tell us what we want to hear, so we follow blind guides online. Not all “authorities” are bad, even online, but we must be very careful who we follow. As far as Church authority goes (which is often questioned) I am most willing to trust authorities that genuinely love and care for those they guide. Or perhaps better, an authority that is self-sacrificial, that is doing what is best for those in their care, not doing what gets them money, clicks, or votes. I’m not saying we should blindly follow that authority, but perhaps be more willing to humbly listen or open to doing things differently than we ourselves would. As God’s people, let’s be and follow a loving, self-sacrificial authority.

Children’s Ministry News

In Daniel 1, Daniel and his friends are working in the king’s palace while in exile. God gives them wisdom to handle a tough situation when the palace food they’re served goes against God’s plan for them. God is wise, and He helps us make wise choices.

During this last week of school, please pray that our educators keep smiling and keep encouraging students: “Look to the LORD and His strength; seek His face always.” I Chronicles 16:11.

Children worked together to rebuild the wall around Jerusalem with a discussion of Nehemiah and God’s faithfulness. Building was intense, cooperation was evident, and smiles were prolific.

Is your calendar marked? Field Day VBS is less than a month away. Families are invited to attend and cheer during Growing Strong in God’s Truths on June 18th, 10:00 a.m. – noon.

School is almost over/Summer is almost here Celebration on Wednesday PM. Kids will enjoy root beer floats (no caffeine, but lots of sugar) and watch a short video. Plan to join us and celebrate a year of learning behind us and a summer of fun ahead.
